Living in the beauty, scenery and peacefulness of Italy, Thomas Hartke and Irene Horbrand, both in their 60s, run A Teira, the only pizzeria open year-round in an Italian village. What started off as a vacation nearly 50 years ago turned into a new life full of unexpected cooking achievements.

“We fell in love with this place in 1975 when we first visited it,” says Hartke. “We came back many times. Then 23 years ago we moved here for good, settling down in a rented house. The locals are friendly and welcoming, there’s a comfortable village atmosphere, and we left nothing behind in Germany: why would we ever go back?”

The couple has always been active. For years they ran the village’s main bar, and then took over the pizzeria in 2016. But running the pizzeria also gave them headaches as permit renewals and day-to-day bureaucracy (官僚主义) can be a trouble. The greatest challenge, however, was making a good—or acceptable—pizza and hoping that locals didn’t find it revolting. Italians tend to get quite upset if someone messes with traditional dishes, especially pasta and pizza, but somehow the locals are attracted by the German couple’s mixtures.

“We knew it wasn’t going to be easy to serve pizza to Italians—it’s such an untouchable, blessed food, but we were never scared of trying, and our courage was rewarded,” says Hartke. “Customers really do appreciate our pizzas, they become regulars and there’re not just foreigners. Even locals come here.”

Irene, a former fur designer, had never made a pizza before deciding that was what she and her husband were going to do. Practically overnight she learned how to make a pizza on a TV course in Germany. Each evening, alone in the small kitchen where not even her husband is allowed, she bakes 60 pizzas, from 6 p. m. to 10 p. m.

24. What made the couple settle down in the Italian village?
- A. The livable environment there. B. Quality elderly care services.
C. Unique delicious local food. D. Their terrible experience in Germany.
25. What is the couple’s attitude to moving to Italy?
- A. Doubtful. B. Determined. C. Worried. D. Unclear.
26. What does the underlined word “revolting” in paragraph 3 probably mean?
- A. Illegal. B. Conservative. C. Cheap. D. Unpleasant.
27. What can we learn about the couple’s process of cooking pizzas?
- A. The husband cooks pizzas following a course.
B. The couple cook the unique pizzas together.
C. The couple make pizzas in the local way.
D. The wife cooks pizzas on her own.

Auke-Florian Hiemstra is a Dutch scientist who studies how wild animals use materials made by humans. “Almost anything can become part of a bird nest,” he says. But he was surprised when someone at a hospital in Antwerp, Belgium sent him a picture of a magpie (喜鹊) nest. The top of the nest had thin metal spikes (刺) pointing out all over. The metal spikes were “anti-bird spikes”, which are usually placed on buildings to prevent birds from landing. But this time, the birds used the spikes to make a nest.

In time, the researchers learned about several other nests in Europe that also used anti-bird spikes. Some were magpie nests; others were made by crows (乌鸦). “These are the craziest bird nests I’ve ever seen,” says Mr. Hiemstra. Magpies and crows are known for being clever. The two kinds of birds are related, and are famous for being able to solve challenging problems.

But the birds didn’t use the spikes in exactly the same ways. The crows used the spikes on the inside of their nests to help make the nests more stable. Magpies have to worry about other birds, including crows, stealing their eggs. Normally, they use thorny (多刺的) branches to build a spiky rounded cover over their nests. But in this case, they appeared to use the spikes like humans do—putting them on top of their nests to keep other birds from landing. Mr. Hiemstra says the magpie nest found in Antwerp had about 1,500 spikes in it.

It’s common for birds to use all kinds of man-made materials in their nests, which can both help and hurt the birds. For example, chemicals from cigarette butts can keep insect pests away, but they can also poison the birds. Bits of string may help birds build nests, but baby birds can get trapped in them. It’s not clear if spikes in nests cause any problems for the birds. But it’s probably more common than we know.

28. What was Auke-Florian Hiemstra surprised at?
- A. Wild animals can use man-made materials.
B. Anything can become a part of a bird nest.
C. Magpies will make nests on top of a hospital.
D. Birds use anti-bird spikes to build their nests.
29. What are crows and magpies famous for?
- A. Having a close relationship.
B. Being smart enough to overcome trouble.
C. Making the craziest bird nests by themselves.
D. Going through anti-bird spikes into buildings.
30. Why do crows use anti-bird spikes?
- A. To build a cover over their nests. B. To keep other birds from landing.
C. To further strengthen their nests. D. To protect their eggs from magpies.

31. What does the last paragraph mainly talk about?
- The commonness of birds using man-made materials.
 - The risk that birds using man-made materials.
 - The diversity of materials birds might choose for their nests.
 - The advantages and disadvantages of birds using man-made materials.

D

There is plenty of research showing that integration(融入) is decisive for a successful student life, both socially and academically, for the individual and for the university. Students who take part in activities and feel connected to their fellow students can get higher grades and are more likely to continue studying. But getting there is a challenge—especially when it comes to the international students. If they are allowed to choose freely, they tend to cooperate with people from the same national group as themselves. The interaction between the students is therefore borderline and reduces the feeling of participation and belonging. So as universities internationalize, the issue becomes increasingly pressing.

But what happens if the students are not allowed to decide for themselves, but instead the teacher provides circumstances for those who will cooperate? Well, then you see very positive effects. It became very clear that academic and social differences were bridged when the teacher decided the pairs, because the students were forced to deal with challenges together in a completely different way than when they chose their own partners or worked in larger groups. Working in pairs reduced the stress that the task brought in. They shared the tasks fairly and the way of working gave rise to new personal communication and in some cases even friendships.

A surprise was the result about communication. Unlike previous studies showing that communication in intercultural groups is a barrier, it was quite the opposite here. One of the factors that the students valued most was good communication. One explanation could be that previous studies were done in English-speaking countries, while in our study almost no one had English as their mother tongue. This means that everyone was used to speaking and understanding a second language.

Integration does not happen by itself, and we cannot put the responsibility on individual students. We need teacher guidance and structured action at all levels so that every single student can experience participation and belonging and can reach their full potential.

32. Which of the following is especially difficult for the international students?
- Deciding whether to go on with their study.
 - Obtaining the qualification to study abroad.
 - Integrating with their fellow students completely.
 - Cooperating with people from the same country.
33. How do teachers affect international students' study?
- By getting them to cooperate with certain classmates.
 - By giving them more academic questions to discuss.
 - Through new education system to preferentially treat them.
 - By means of forming special groups with the same nationality.
34. What conclusion can be drawn from the recent research?
- Communication in intercultural groups is the biggest barrier.
 - Forced communication is not good for students' integration.
 - English plays a decisive role in cross-cultural communication.
 - Communication between different languages becomes active.

35. What is the best title for the text?
- International students are facing many challenges.
 - Pairing students supports integration at universities.
 - Students lack participation and a sense of belonging.
 - University internationalization becomes increasingly pressing.

It was the Annual Inter-school Primary Sports Meet at the National Stadium. I sat down next to my principal, Mr Tan, in the preparation room as he gave me some words of encouragement. I was taking part in the 100-metre race event.

"Just one more gold medal from the last event, Tyson! You can do it! Nila Primary School will win the Champion School Cup!" Mr Tan encouraged me before he left the room. Just then, I saw Robert, the best runner from Sunshine Primary School, walking towards me. Suddenly, he grabbed my T-shirt and pulled me towards him. I could smell his terrible breath. "You are nothing! You will never beat me!" Robert said, trying to make me angry.

I pushed him away and shouted at him. "The same to you! I'm not frightened by your threats!" I replied with a fearless glare. Hearing this, Robert walked away, speechless. Soon, we heard an announcement to gather at the starting point. As I looked up and heard the deafening cheer from the sea of spectators (观众), I was awed. The atmosphere was exciting!

"On your mark. Get set!" the judge announced. There was dead silence in the air. Suddenly, I heard the firing of the starter's gun and I burst forth. Robert and I were neck and neck until I spotted a frog leaping towards us. Robert screamed and ran into my lane suddenly. Unfortunately, we tripped over each other and landed hard on the tracks. There was a loud gasp from the spectators stand. Other competitors rushed by and none stopped to help us. Sportsmanship arose from my heart suddenly. I got up and helped Robert to his feet. He could not run so I put my right arm over his shoulders and we walked slowly past the finish line. The crowd cheered. The moment we crossed that, Robert thanked me and sat down heavily to the ground. I later knew that he had suffered an ankle injury.
